Excerpt: ...Indiana, an immense country to the north-west of these districts, and the vast regions drained by the rivers, from their confluence to Louisiana, including the wooded parts of Arkansas, according to Audubon, are the most abundantly supplied with this magnificent bird. The wild turkey is to a certain degree, migratory in its habits, and associates in flocks during the autumn and winter 152 WILD TURKEY. months. About the beginning of October, when the fruits and seeds are about to fall from the trees, these birds collect together and gradually move towards the rich lands of the Ohio and Mississippi. The males, or gobblers, associate in parties varying from ten to a hundred, and search for food apart from the females; the latter, with their young broods, usually join each other, forming parties of seventy or eighty, and assiduously avoid the old males, which evince a disposition to attack and destroy the young till they are fully grown. The flocks of the district all move in the same direction, seldom taking wing unless to escape the hunters dog, or cross a river, which latter feat is not performed till after some delay, during which they ascend the highest eminences, and strut about and gobble as if to raise their courage to a pitch befitting the emergency. Even the females and young assume at this juncture a pompous demeanour, spread out their tails, and pur loudly. When the weather is settled, and they themselves prepared, they take to flight for the opposite shore: the old and robust easily cross a river of the breadth of a mile, but the young and meagre birds often find then, strength fail, and fall into the water, not however to be drowned, as might be imagined. They bring their wings close to the body, spread out their tail,...
