Not illustrated. 1888 Excerpt: ...the United States. The Eurygastrina belong to this family, and have a less deep and convex oval form, and are either gray and yellow mixed, or some shade of brown, with a long but narrower scutellum. The Scutellerina are represented by Libyssa, which has a thick, spindle-shaped body, usually of some hue of green or blue, reflecting the light in rich variety of colors; or sometimes the surface is emerald green, covered with granulated asperities. It belongs to Africa and its islands. The family Arthropteride comprehends a large assemblage of flat, very wide forms, chiefly of a black color, highly polished, marked in various ways with yellow, or sometimes yellow spotted or clouded with brown or black. All but two or three of the species inhabit the Orient, Africa, and the Pacific Islands. Glancing beyond the vast multitude of modern species, only a few of which could here be brought into view, we are confronted by still another great assemblage, the members of which equally sustain relations to the groups already enumerated. These are the remnants of ancient faunas which have been saved to us from the wreck and reconstruction of former geological periods. Away back in the dim distance of the primitive past, when the scouring of land surfaces by floods and tides deposited beds of sediment upon the lower levels, numberless specimens of Hemiptera were caught in the moving waters and there buried in earthy matter, afterwards to become mineralized in the stony layers which have since been raised into the ridges and cliffs that we find to-day. The oldest known Hemiptera have been dug from the carboniferous shales, and these have been provisionally referred to the Fulgoridae. But the secondary rocks, especially the lias in Europe, have yielded great numbers of fossi...
